IN REASING LATINX PRESEN E IN THE GREATER ENGINEERING COMMUNITY

The Latinx presence in engineering has steadily declined since the 1970s. Currently, Latinos are only 6% of the engineering workforce, while Latinas represent just 1%. Through previous studies, students' and young professionals' experiences have been identified as a major factor.

In these studies, Latinx students reported a positive undergraduate experience overall, however, they faced issues around sexism and exclusion. Early career professionals reported similar exclusion and discrimination in the workplace. During such a critical period
